The right to play

Human rights month

Every March, South Africa celebrates human rights month, culminating in multiple human rights day celebrations on 21 March.

While there are many human rights, TLASA wants to highlight children's right to play this month. All children have the right to play, and this is crucial for their development, health and wellbeing.

Play is not optional, not something to do when there are nothing else of importance. No, play as a right is not less important than other rights. Play is essential and should be prioritised.

Through play, other rights can also be realised, such as health, participation, inclusion and education.

As toy libraries, we are able to provide play spaces, resources and opportunities to children in order for them to realise their right to play.
